

According to one inscription, from the year 1191, 20,000 divinities in gold, silver, bronze, and stone were to be found spread out over the various provinces. They were served by 15,000 villages and 300,000 persons. To these gods 38,000 tons of rice were delivered every year.

This was the temples' economic justification. The divinities and the cult were the form taken by the economic exploitations of rice were delivered every year during the ninth century. The great economic progress made during the ninth century had increased the numbers of the population, increased the yield, made the ruling class ever wealthier and more powerful, and the common people ever poorer.
